FINAL DRAFT

Students should go to college right after completing the high school education because there are possibilities of losing interest in pursuing a career afterwards, getting a job and keep working for more several years, or not enrolling in a post secondary education at all due a new world of opportunities without "restrictions" as they become adults.

There is a great value for high school students to attend post secondary education because they get involved immediately in making a future for themselves. Most likely, if they take a year or more time off, chances are that they will loose interest on education, as they may feel comfortable staying at home without homeworks or other school projects, and the opportunity to wake up late, specially in these bitter winter days.

On the other hand, some recent graduates from high school may need a job in order to meet the daily expenses. After all, education is not free, but an investment for life. There is a need to save some money for books, transportation, or even more, finish college without debt. However, once students start making money, enjoying the work environment, meeting interesting people at work or getting promoted, returning to school can become a real conflict of interest.

Finally, most of the high school students experience the new world in a different way. They are not kids anymore and they want to be treated as adults. They want to experience and discover this new stage in their lives. These people may have not lost interest on education and have concerns for their future, but feel they can make up their minds now as they consider what is the best. Going back to college after high school may sound like they still have to follow rules at home, when they want to do something different like moving out of the house, engage in a serious relationship or travel.
It took me over ten years to realize how important education is. It empowers the life of people and is a rewarding way to build the student's future. No matter how exciting the world can be without having to study for exams, writing essays and have to go to classes "again"; attending college right after completing high school education is the best decision students can make.
