OUTLINE
(recommended but not evaluated)

- Globalization can certainly lead to a proliferation of weaker voices, but it has also allowed less dominant voices to be heard.

- Change occurs naturally, and this will continue to happen.

- From globalization sprouts a new hybrid culture, which is less valuable than one on the brink of extinction.

- I think it's important for our society to have an awareness of what we possess and what we stand to lose.

FINAL DRAFT

In the past twenty years, as modes of mass communication and transportation have developed, the world has become a more connected place. Starbucks and McDonald's are ubiquitous, and YouTube videos posted in Korea can become instant hits in North America. To some, the development of a global culture may seem threatening. After all, weaker voices of less dominant people's stand to be lost as we move towards an homogeneous, Western-dominated monoculture. Globalization, however, has and the technology that caused it, can also give strength to weaker voices. Furthermore, it has sprouted a new and exciting hybrid of many cultures, the value of which cannot be denied. While globalization is a reality for those who remain concerned about the loss of culture, it is important to remember that change—and with change comes both gain and loss—is constant, and that some cultural loss as time progresses should be expected.

Mass communication, though it has threatened some cultures, has strengthened many. A good example of this can be found in film. In Toronto, we have a plethora of film festivals, both large and small, that give voices to a wide variety of, less dominant voices. The Toronto International Film Festival is a celebration of global cinema, while the Ossus draws attention to true stories from around the world. Imagine Native Film Festival is geared towards showcasing the voices of marginalized aboriginal populations. Ironically, the mass communication technology that pipes Oreo commercials into living rooms also empowers people whose culture may be on the brink of disappearing.

Another positive offshoot of globalization is the resulting sharing of culture. To suggest that one culture dominates in this world of many voices is inaccurate. In fact, as a result of globalization, North Americans have never heard as many other voices as we do now. Globalization, rather than destroying culture, has led to the development of a new, global hybrid culture. Young people in Toronto no longer listen to music or watch films produced in North America. This is a world where a teenager from Afghanistan downloads Korean pop tunes and Russian rap music in the evenings (this is a former student of mine, and I've known many others like him). At this rate, our world will continue to develop a rich culture that is a hybrid of many contributors. This prospect is exciting because rather than killing culture, globalization has allowed us to share and preserve many cultures together.

In the end, it is true that some culture will die out. This is probably most evident when we look at the prevalence of the English language today. Young people from English-speaking countries often choose to teach English overseas after college or university, and the market for our language (and culture) is huge.
That being said, the loss of culture on the whole, is not a bad thing. Throughout time, cultures have been born and lost. Languages have lived long lives, then died. If we consider English as an example, it has only existed in its present form for under 500 years. 1000 years ago, it didn’t exist at all. One can only assume that at some point in the future, it, too, will perish. In our global society, less dominant voices will inevitably die out as well. Fortunately, however, people and have never had greater access to the resources that allow them to preserve and share their bits of their culture that still remain.

Change is rarely all good or all bad. The change brought about by globalization has created exciting opportunities for many, but it has also led to great cultural loss for others. Moving forward, I believe it is important for us to accept all that comes with global change. At the same time, we have both the power and the responsibility to preserve what we can and to empower those whose voices are weak. Fortunately, globalization has increased our desire to share as well as our acceptance of other cultures. In the midst of all this sharing, I can only feel positive about what the future brings for our globalized world.
